LOCAL communities are raising the alarm on road safety issues along Jalan Chan Sow Lin in Kuala Lumpur.

This comes as the bustling industrial and commercial area faces mounting challenges from a surge in road traffic.

From inadequate road markings to the plethora of plastic road barriers and potholes, traffic infrastructure is struggling to cope in this city area that is over a century old.

This mix of issues has led to growing congestion and safety concerns from an influx of vehicles, primarily due to Setiawangsa-Pantai Expressway (SPE) which opened last year and passes overhead.

Kepong community social activist and road user Yee Poh Ping said the main problem was Jalan Chan Sow Lin being narrow yet having to cater to an increasing number of vehicles.

"By right, the authorities should have completed all the necessary facilities before SPE was opened to traffic.

"In Jalan Chan Sow Lin, we are witnessing a perfect storm of road-related problems which have created a dangerous environment for users," said Yee.

He cited a lack of clear road markings, potholes posing a threat to vehicles and pedestrians alike, and haphazardly placed plastic road barriers that confuse drivers.

"When vehicles from Cheras, the Cheras flyover, Jalan Tun Razak and Pudu converge at the Jalan Chan Sow Lin junction, there are inadequate road markings for vehicles intending to turn onto Jalan Chan Sow Lin Satu heading towards the Kuala Lumpur-Seremban highway," he said.

Yee opined that widening the Jalan Chan Sow Lin junction would greatly improve safety for all road users.

"We urge Kuala Lumpur City Hall to prioritise the enhancement of Jalan Chan Sow Lin to ensure the well-being of everyone who relies on this critical thoroughfare.

"Local businesses and residents near the area are looking for a comprehensive solution," he added.
